who shall run industry. The workers put their lives into business The bosses invest their capby labor. Profits insist that owners should run the business. Organization gives labor a voice in running the business. A strong union can take from the owners a part of the power to determine the conditions of labor. Once this power has been taken from the boss all else follows. While that power remains in the hands of the boss all else is empty wind.

There can be no final compromise on this point. There must be a gradual increase in the power exercised by labor. There may be a long period in which that power will be shared. But al-ways labor's share will be increasing. Finally there must come a time when labor will control the government and the government will own industry.
